Easier perhaps, but installing Python/Perl/Ruby on Windows also expands the attack surface considerably. PowerShell, on the other hand, ships with all versions of Windows.

>more reliable than Bash on Linux (no weird spacing issues, ...)

Counter-opinion:

I am a UNIX sysadmin. Mostly RHEL and BSD, nowadays. With a few years' experience and by following some simple rules, a shell script is far more reliable and portable. (If you're using bashisms, you're doing it very wrong indeed.) I have shell scripts I wrote over a decade ago that are running today on completely different OSes.

Over the last five years or so, I've helped manage a couple dozen Windows servers, mostly for quick one-off tasks. Not really my responsibility or area of expertise, just helping out. My exposure to PS thusfar has been terrible, but I can't honestly say I had any interest to begin with, so I know I'm biased.

It comes down to one thing: Every time I find myself attempting to follow even official Microsoft documentation, the commands don't work. They either don't exist in the versions of whatever we're running or the arguments/options are different. I am not exaggerating. Every time.

Maybe that says more about our Windows sysadmins than PS. Maybe I have a fundamental misunderstanding somewhere. Dunno. Don't really care. Just my experience.

The concept of smartphones themselves are great, but because of how the market works nobody wants to go any experimentation with form like with older cellphones which means we just get a bunch of shitty glass slabs.

Props to blackberry for at least trying, but slapping a keyboard onto a 5.5in glass slab does not work at all.

Anyone have experience with these, like the one pictured? Are they worth it for the average user?

I like the idea of having the control module with the nice knob for volume and easy access to ports. Is the sound quality a big difference over the one on motherboards? I've got nice speakers.

I meant 1.0 as in mono just for emphasis to my point. I mean, 2 speakers 2.0 is okay when you've gotta run it, but if you're looking to improve your audio quality output, the simplest way is to simply remove the bass from the main speakers so they can focus on the highs, thus anons post confused me because it made it seem like they were saying 2.1 is unnecessary too.

I'm not the one you first replied to, I just wanted to make sure you really meant 1.0.

It's true what you say though.

I know a person that makes music and doesn't have a sub so his music sound WAY too basy when you actually use a sub that is correctly set up.

Not only that but having music done in 2.1, 4.0, 5.1 makes it sound so much better and it pains me that DVD audio didn't become standard now that we have online streaming instead so we could have 24-bit sound with multichannel layouts.

Yeah, I know that pain, so so bad.

Worst bit is I have a friend who likes to think they're a DJ/"party master", he's got a set-up which for the most part is great, but it's literally just two huge speakers connected to his mac laptop. There's no dedicated subwoofer. So what does he do? Of course, he plays bassy shit like none other and turns it right up, thinking he's so awesome.

I just look at it and think what the fuck is he doing, because ANYONE who wants niggerbass should just go and fucking get a sub.

Most people who want it realise you gotta do that, but he reckons the two speakers are big, powerful and expensive enough that they compensate just fine and he can't afford to add a sub to his system right now.

Lo and behold, I steer clear from his little DJ gigs these days because not only is it cringe to see him fuck up so bad, its just cringe to see people trying to be the next Skrillex or something anyway.

(No, I won't insult proper, decent DJ's by saying he's trying to be the next Daft Punk or something.)

I do live sound and I've always called a system mono if the left and right are linked. Mono doesn't have to mean one speaker, just one sound mix.

>do semi-pro sound >know nothing about consumer grade stuff

Suffering.
